cultural education has extended to great lengths in the dairy districts of Europe, and there are no parts of the world where the benefits of well-managed co-operation are better understood than in Sweden and Denmark. The latter has about a thousand co-operative manufacturing dairies. These co-operative societies have arranged their business so as to work almost completely without the assistance of the middleman of the system is well explained in a recent report. The Danish farmers have representatives in England, who sell to retailers, or even, to a considerable extent, to consumers, from whom they receive the price in large sums. Danish dairies, unlike the

the profits of the most economical system of manufacture, and the middle-man as well. Everything is done in a systematic manner, from the feeding of the cows (regulated by the rules of the co-operative dairies) to the grading, pricing, and marketing of the butter. No trouble has been spared.

The Danish agricultural societies laid the foundation of Denmark's success as a great exporter of dairy produce, and to give credit where such is due, it may be said that two or three of the agricultural societies of this colony have followed the example of Denmark. The Danes also aided the Danish farmers. The Holstein system of butter-making was the first innovation, and it was closely followed by the deep-setting plan—aided by ice.

Trade-men of every kind, carpenters, builders, blacksmiths, platers, tailors, and makers of every handicraft, applied for the file of bankrupts in no large proportion as to show the restriction that has been laid on the purchasing power of the people. But one of the most curious things in the list is the large number of hotelkeepers, who, no less than the others, are on a schedule. Boniface seems a man so little troubled with the ordinary cares of life, and so genial, that one might think that the shadow of the Bankruptcy

The system is following closely on the lines adopted by Denmark; but it is remarkable that the dairies on the large estates of Sweden to a great extent take the place of co-operative dairies in Denmark, and it is known that where butter is made on a wholesale scale from one large herd of cows, it is better than when made from mixed milk. In a recent report on dairying in Sweden the British Consul writes from Gothenburg:—"Previous to the present system of dairy farming in Sweden, which is of recent date, the dairies were small and the dairymen probably the outcome of those relations between the occupant and the owner in this special trade which are so often complained of as being one-sided and selfish. Taken altogether, the list is a melancholy one, though, as sorrow endureth for a night, but joy cometh in the morning, it is probable that most of them, when they have passed the ordeal of the whitewash brush, will begin life again, blithe and hopeful, as if nothing had happened.

bought up from the farmers and churned. This mode of working produced what was now called second butter. There were also several butter factories, but now there is not one in the country. A butter factory is a place where the butter is bought up from the farmers in lumps of 5lb. to 10lb., or 20lb., sorted as to quality and colour, pressed through rollers with fluted rollers, and then packed in casks." It appears that what is done now is productive of much better results, for the Consul says:—"The superiority of the butter, particularly from the co-operative dairies, is chiefly owing to the advantages which are secured by these operations, and may principally be ascribed to the responsible relation in which the dairy and its purveyors stand to the general labourer, open also to include the bush worker. A meeting will be held in Melbourne of the General Labourers' Union of Australia, when it is proposed to seek to change the name of their organisation to that of the Australian Workers' Union, and to widen the membership to include all in the various unions in a body. If these changes are sanctioned, a federation of labour will result that will be important in numbers and collective weight as long as common objects are set before members. It may be doubted, however, whether this will be the result if it looks like the fault of the scheme at present outlined is that it is too ambitious, and attempts the union of men employed in several callings now

The chief advantage of the co-operative system no doubt is, that the large landowner as well as the small farmer or peasant may be a shareholder in the dairy, and thus the latter may also enjoy the advantages afforded by a well-arranged dairy. It is apparent that all which industry, skill, and business tact can do is being done to make sure the supremacy of the products sent by the European countries mentioned to the English markets. Australian dairymen must not foolishly imagine that the demand for fruit of which is a trivial kind. The butter which is sent from here to London needs to be remarkable for its uniformly good quality. The strictest care should be exercised in testing the lots intended for shipment. years hold an inexhaustible market for her butter in England. Strong competition may for a while keep prices low; but, for reasons given in this review, the opposing parties are likely to receive harm in the end. It will soon be discovered that, unless under conditions of some extraordinary kind, it will prove too costly an undertaking to run out Australian butter from England's chief markets.

The commercial obituary column published in our yesterday's issue, under the heading of the "Bankruptcy business of last year," is not exhilarating reading. The year has been an unhealthy one, and it is strange what a uniformity character-that wages for the different descriptions of bushwork be fixed by a conference of representatives from the General Labourers' Union and the Pastoralists' Union. Instead of the latter being asked to adopt yet another platform and to send out delegates during the 1893 session to preach it, the best hope for satisfactory relations would be found in a like reasonable spirit throughout, and a candid recognition of the right of the employer to a voice in all questions that concern himself.

Just as an epidemic of influenza swells the mortality tables of the year—but not to a remarkable extent—the epidemic of depression increases the total number of the fallen, but, from whatever source, the average of commercial deaths like that of the mortality tables, preserves a singular steadiness from year to year. Year before last 237 persons perished, and this year last year 1463 gave off its fortune best. It is for the remainder of the season so to enable the Government to get on with the important measure at present before Parliament.

The work is part of an extensive reclamation which was taken in hand by the Hon. Mr. Justice, and converts a patch of sea into a valuable area of land.

At the preliminary, Mr. Lyons resumed and otherwise, all rights on ought to be reclaimed, so as to guard against any difficulty.

He promised to construct a road, he rights, including water frontage, at the Flaxa were proposed creating a new dyke of stone, marking the limit of the was thrown across the bay, and it was the filling in of the sea bed by the Sydney corporation. Of the area thus the Government reserved a frontage of harbours and the North Sydney corporation as a reserve. The council commenced of filling in, but very soon dis- the work.

the bad smells arising from the frequently anoxic mud was made the Harbours and Rivers Department fill in the area. The cost of the part half the cost of placing the one, and on the 21st November last the Neptune was moored close to the dyke, commencing dumping of the enclosed silt. The silt was from Woonah-moo Bay, Darling Point, and other places where dredging had been going on. The silt was as raised had been sent out to sea, but taken to Neutral Bay and dumped in Neptune, which was the first time around, and dumped the silt on to the area. As showing the power of the dumping gear, it is of interest to note that the material dumped by the Neptune was 97,000 tons. Up to yesterday the Neptune had dumped about 97,000 tons of reclamation, this total representing six times the quantity dumped in the Middle Harbour since the work was and having been idle for a week at the dumping of silt at Neutral Bay will be used, the water will be pumped and dumped it into the dyke. The area about an acre and a half, and the cost not less than £1500 per acre. The 150ft. raised by the Government representative. The remainder 1/4 acre will be a Sydney Council for public recreation.

On works are also being carried out at Cove. This forms part of the scheme and is being carried out on precisely similar conditions. A stone dam constructed across the mouth of the river of £15000. The corporation will be the sewerage construction branch of the Department is constructing a storm-through the property. As soon as this, the Kingston, was completed, the redolence was completely filled in. The redolence has an area of 30 acres, of Government reserve about one acre, leaving the remainder in the hands of the landowner. The redolence was particularly offensive in June, hence the redamination, if it does not, will get rid of offensive smells and will be healthy. The redamination is a nuisance, but there is a large population in the vicinity.

At the time of the introduction of the pump work of redamination was necessarily a great deal of material having to be wheeled to the hoppers. This was the case with the work done in Farna Cove, Rushcutters Bay, and at the wharves in the Sydney Harbour. The material was wheeled ashore, took a long time to remain stored for a long time, and was found to their discomfort and to the annoyance of the public, as mud from one harbour with mud from another part of the harbour, a solid redolence has been obtained.

The average cost of filling-in, introduction of the pump dredgers, was $100, the price for wheeling the material out to a pier, according to the estimate had to be added. Under the plan of pumping the silt on to the recreation coast is about 14¢ per ton.

At Neutral Point, near Greening Cove is a boat out under the direction of Mr. C. W. W. Jones, the Engineer-in-Chief for Harbours.
